Morfix Mobile is now available for Android-based mobile phones. More features are now available on Morfix Mobile, the ultimate English-Hebrew-English dictionary for mobile phones.

Melingo, owner of the popular free online English-Hebrew-English dictionary Morfix, has enhanced its dictionary application to support Android-based mobile phones. The new version that now operates on iPhone and Android phones includes additional features that enhance users' productivity. You can download Morfix to your mobile phone using the links below.

The Morfix application includes a quick, easy access to all of the popular dictionary's contents, including Hebrew and English translations, pronunciations of English words and additional content from Wikipedia. The application also stores the list of recent lookups made, for later reference. An interesting feature included in the product is "Pick a random word" – by clicking on the 6-sided die icon Morfix presents a random term and its description.

With the updated application, users may enhance their productivity by copying the English translation results for use with other mobile applications. Another enhanced feature is the reverse search. When users translate a Hebrew word or expression, Morfix mobile provides an English results page with several terms. Users can click the results and then pick any of those terms to perform a reverse translation, i.e. from English back to Hebrew.

Previous upgrades included full support for iOS version 4 including multitasking and performance improvements. The android application is intended for use on Android v. 2.2 devices and above.

Yaron Danieli, Melingo CEO said: "We are committed to providing more value to our customers by enhancing our free Morfix Mobile application. With Morfix Mobile our customers can enjoy our service on the move".

So far over 140,000 users downloaded Morfix Mobile. With the new support for Android, Melingo is expecting many more mobile users.
